| The class discusses material objects of China's past with a special interest in what they can tell us about the people who produced and used them, and, in a broader view, about the time and society that shaped them. |                          |  |
| Intended learning outcomes   |                          |  |
| Students will develop both a synchronic and diachronic view of history. They will be able to notice similarities and differences to European material culture and in this way enhance their intercultural competencies. |                          |  |
