Contents
Based on the introductory module SB1, the passive and active use of the basics of Chinese language and writing is activated and a vocabulary of approximately 400 characters is developed. In theory and practice, students are intensively provided with Chinese phonetics, which is practised in small groups. Exact articulation and intonation are intensively practised and individually improved.
Intended learning outcomes
Based on a vocabulary of approximately 400 characters, students know and are able to activate textbook contents in their own initial texts. They acquire a secure tonality and pronunciation. Successful participation in the elementary level of HSK is possible. Secure tonality and pronunciation.

In addition, a consecutive development of the basics in modern Chinese and the broadening of vocabulary and supplementation of grammatical phenomena by means of intensive written and oral exercises takes place. Further to the acquisition of the basics of the Chinese language, grammatical knowledge is developed in theory and practice and deepened through text analysis. For this purpose, selected texts are used in an exemplary and well-directed manner with respect to the teaching material and a practice-oriented analysis of grammatical language structures is practised. The activation of the ability to express oneself in writing as well as specific translation exercises into Chinese pursue the goal of applying and consolidating the grammatical phenomena acquired and strengthening of translation skills, especially from German into Chinese.
Intended learning outcomes
Students have a systematic text-oriented knowledge of basic grammatical structures, basic translation skills, the ability to reproduce texts that are related to the teaching material in terms of content and style, and the ability to formulate sentence structures independently. Furthermore, they have a listening comprehension oriented to the teaching material. The vocabulary is based on a knowledge of approximately 700 characters.

Students broaden their vocabulary and grammatical language skills. In addition to the passively known vocabulary, the actively known characters reach approximately 1000. The ability to reproduce texts, which are based on the teaching material in terms of content and style, as well as the independent formulation of sentence structures is practised in preparation for the integrated and compulsory stay abroad at Peking University in terms of learning techniques and methods.
Intended learning outcomes
Students acquire a systematic and basic linguistic expertise in preparation for increasing their textual competence for their stay in Beijing. Grammatical structures are systematically practised and activated in an overview on texts that complement the teaching material of the language courses.

The focus is on oral communication and the teaching of everyday language. A special focus is placed on language situations that are of particular relevance at the beginning of the compulsory semester abroad in Beijing. Passive and active language skills are practised on the basis of the modules SB1-3 in a situation-specific manner. The first part of the module is held in a two-week crash course before the start of the regular lecture period of the winter semester. In the accreditation procedure, a summer language course in the PRC organised and supervised by Würzburg and the ECLC office at PKU can be recognised instead of the crash course in Würzburg. The second part of the module is a semester course.
Students acquire speaking skills suitable for everyday use. The focus is on oral communication. Students are able to understand and respond appropriately to everyday situations within the framework of their vocabulary and the language structures practised in the textbooks.

The compulsory semester at Peking University, which is coordinated, evaluated and accompanied by local teachers, serves to intensify language training as well as to activate linguistic knowledge. The confrontation with a number of other native speakers as teachers as well as the linguistic environment in Beijing places linguistic competence in all fields (spoken language, written expression, reading competence) on a broad basis. A systematic repetition of grammatical phenomena is used to deepen the knowledge. The modules within the framework of the compulsory semester abroad in the fourth semester take place exclusively at Peking University. For this purpose, teaching material has been designed that takes the current social, cultural and regional context substantially into account. On the basis of exercises, learning contents are intensified. All grammar is intensively repeated and specifically completed from the perspective of Chinese linguistics. The written skills are intensified through regular essay training.
Students reach the advanced level of language acquisition. They are able to develop natural texts in addition to the teaching material. They are also able to adequately present everyday life and general questions independently in texts with medium length (approximately 1000 characters).

Based directly on the students' level of knowledge, selected practical life and professional topics (education, culture, medicine, administration, advertising, Beijing) are developed, and the oral skills are intensified and broadened. In addition, oral presentations in Chinese are practised and presented. The ability to independently differentiate active and passive vocabulary is practised.
Intended learning outcomes
Students are able to coherently and appropriately present topic-specific facts in presentations of approximately 15 minutes. They are able to differentiate between active and passive vocabulary that has to be learned independently. The active vocabulary reaches 1500-2000 characters.

The module covers three thematic contents, dealing with complex texts, technical language skills and advanced colloquial language. The language competence that the students have acquired in the 4th semester at Peking University is broadened. The students' reading skills are deepened by using selected texts that are characterised by specific content and style, as well as communicative practice of culture and subject-specific vocabulary. Further areas of competence are: reading and writing official documents as well as understanding formal texts; the passive and active dealing with official documents in the form of different text types is practised. Official language as well as forms of politeness are passively taught in various written contexts and actively practised.
The ability to develop stylistically more demanding texts and to discuss them in communicative exercises is practised. The ability to express oneself in writing with subject-specific vocabulary and appropriate written expression is practised. The students are able to present complex topics in Chinese.

The module continues the three thematic contents, the scope with complex texts, technical language competences as well as advanced colloquial language from the fifth language semester. Topics from cultural, economic and social areas with relevance to current affairs are chosen by the lecturers. Thematic presentations and the appropriate presentation of opinions and contributions are practised. Advanced elements of oral skills such as idioms and figures of speech are introduced and practised. In the area of technical language, the use of media language is broadened and deepened. News, articles and advertisements in written and oral form from different media such as newspapers, radio, television and the Internet are analysed as examples. The understanding of media language and the ability to systematically reproduce media content is practised. Introduction to the use of academic texts, and in relation to this, practice of the basics of oral academic presentation in Chinese.
Students are able to independently develop and adequately master general language, professional, study-related as well as academic texts with general and subject-related vocabulary of advanced difficulty. They are able to develop complex sentence structures, use subject-specific vocabulary and express themselves appropriately in writing and orally on a variety of cultural and subject-related topics. Independent knowledge of a media-specific vocabulary is achieved.

The module consists of two parts, an "Introduction to Sinology Tools" and an "Introduction to Writing". The introduction to sinological tools and working methods provides students with the basics and possibilities of Western and Chinese-language lexical and digital resources at the beginning of their studies through intensive practice. The "Introduction to Writing" aims to improve practical writing competence, also through intensive practice, as well as to lay the foundations and deepen methodological and theoretical knowledge of Chinese writing. The goal is to link the theory and practice of writing. The module is a compulsory module for first-year students and is therefore aligned with the level of language training in the first Chinese language semester.
By presenting the appropriate tools and directly practising their use, the students are able to critically consult suitable sinological tools. On the basis of systematic orthographic knowledge and an understanding of central theoretical aspects of Chinese writing, students are able to independently and effectively broaden their own written vocabulary.

The module consists of a lecture on the contemporary history of the People's Republic of China (PRC) and a seminar on Chinese regional studies. The lecture introduces students to the first 40 years of the PRC (1949 to 1989). The regional studies seminar provides knowledge on physical-geographical basics, administrative structures of the PRC, population, regional disparities, social welfare and cultural mechanisms. The module is a compulsory module aimed at first-year students in the first semester.
Intended learning outcomes
Students have a solid knowledge of the political history of the People's Republic of China until 1989 as well as of regional, geographical and ecological facts and fundamental social developments. They are able to classify further topics on contemporary China in this basic structure.

In two courses within one year, the module offers an overview of the history of China from the Neolithic cultures to the end of the Republican period. In addition to a chronological introduction to the factual history, there is a thematic deepening in the following areas of epoch-typical relevance, such as tensions between centre and periphery, state unity and regional fragmentation, aristocracy and bureaucracy, self-image and world view, relation between city and country, philosophical and religious movements, evidence of material culture, economic reforms or international relations. An introduction to the state of historiographical discussion of the most important epochs and areas of Chinese history is given.
Students are able to independently classify events in Chinese history chronologically and thematically. They are able to analyse historical phenomena comparatively and critically and to establish references to current China from a historical perspective. They have the basic knowledge of independent and in-depth familiarisation with further historical questions.

The module consists of an introduction to Chinese studies (methods and academic writing) and three seminar papers. On the basis of the introduction to Chinese studies and in conjunction with the seminars attended, three seminar papers are to be written. These should deal with an appropriate question agreed upon with the lecturer, which is worked on coherently, stringently and comprehensibly with the help of academic literature in an appropriate scope and taking into account methodological aspects. In the seminar, students are introduced to the practical skills of writing academic papers, preparing presentations, exploiting subject areas and compiling a bibliography. Furthermore, they are introduced to sinological methods and topics such as the discussion of methods in sinology, current trends, training in the critical use of academic literature and exploiting academic journals.
Students are able to critically classify Chinese studies topics and to recognise and use different methods and approaches in a meaningful way. The students have the ability to independently write an academic paper within a given time frame. Students have the basic ability to work independently in modern Chinese studies.

The module comprises two courses on Chinese contemporary history. In the lecture on China's most recent history (from 1990), students get a contemporary historical overview of the most important events in politics, economy and society. This forms the basis for in-depth courses in other modules. The second component of the module is a seminar on Greater China, which deals with the historical, political and social developments of Taiwan, Hong Kong and Singapore. This module is aimed at students in an early to intermediate stage of their studies.
The module provides students with the ability to orientate themselves in China's contemporary history as well as in the context of Greater China. They become familiar with the subject area of their studies and, on this basis, are able to decide independently which partial aspects they would like to deepen and supplement in other advanced modules.

The module consists of the lecture "Political System of the PR China" and the seminar "Beijing". The basic knowledge of political structures and processes, as taught in the lecture on the political system of the PRC, is indispensable for a deeper understanding of other subject areas. The second course of this module is a seminar that deals with the capital of the PRC and examines historical, social, cultural and economic aspects of its urban development. The module is aimed at students in the intermediate stage of their studies.
Students acquire the ability to understand political structures and processes in the People's Republic of China and to assess their impact on society. Furthermore, they are able to orientate themselves in Beijing and its urban history, which enriches and facilitates their stay there in their fourth semester.

Within the framework of two courses, the module offers an insight into the economic development of the PRC as well as into current China-specific economic issues. The first course provides an overview of China's economic developments in the context of the social and political framework since the founding of the PRC. In the seminars, the growing importance of China for the global economy is dealt with on the basis of selected questions from a macro perspective. The main focus is on effects of relevant economic reforms, industrial policy and corporate strategies. The second course focuses on the challenges of management in China or in Chinese companies, i.e. the micro perspective. The module is aimed at students in the intermediate to later stage of their studies.
In this module, students acquire the ability to classify economic developments in a historical overview on the one hand and to classify economic news on China and to understand differences of economic systems and the significance of cultural influencing factors for entrepreneurial activities in China, in cooperation with and in competition with Chinese companies on the other hand.

The module is composed of two courses that provide an overview of the cultural history of China in the 20th and 21st centuries, with a focus on the field of visual arts. The development of cultural areas, contents and discussions as well as their interaction with political and social history form the basis. The division of the topics into the period up to the foundation of the People's Republic of China, the epoch before the reforms and up to 1989 will enable a comparison. The course "Cultural Modernity" deals with the contemporary period. Epochs and breaks in development are explored using theoretical discourses and examples. The module is aimed at students in the second half of their studies.
Students are able to provide a sound content-related and critical classification of contemporary developments in the field of visual arts in modern China and to contextualise individual phenomena. They are able to independently and critically develop further thematic areas of cultural creation, especially the visual arts, of contemporary China in an academic manner.

The module consists of the lecture "China's Literary Tradition" and the seminar "Modern Literature of China". The lecture "China's Literary Tradition" offers an overview of literary history from the 3rd to the 18th century. Based on outstanding individual texts and authors, the lecture introduces the most important epochs, genres, themes and conventions of representation, but also relevant contexts. The seminar "Modern Literature of China" deals with Chinese literature from the late 19th to the 21st century. This part also deals with a representative selection of texts, but is increasingly devoted to in-depth and interpretative work on the text. The social, political and cultural-political contexts are discussed in detail.
The participants of this module are able to classify Chinese texts in translation in terms of literary history, to contextualise them in terms of cultural history and to explain their formal and content-related peculiarities. In dealing with modern texts, they master techniques of literary text analysis and the critical handling of secondary literature.

The module consists of a theoretical and historical introduction to forms of the Chinese public sphere and a more practice-oriented introduction to contemporary Chinese media. The historical emergence of patterns concerning the production of social public spheres from the 20th century to the present is systematised on the basis of various representative subject areas (print media, propaganda, television, internet) and placed in a media-theoretical discourse. In the practice-oriented seminar in Beijing, the familiarisation with Chinese media takes place through the example and reading of current exemplary articles from the fields of society, politics, sport, science, medicine and the environment in the print media, on radio and television as well as on the internet.
The overview of the development concerning the different stages of media publicity and the targeted selective deepening enables the students to competently understand and assess the development of the media landscape in the PR China. The media presentation of current topics can be competently and critically classified on the basis of the already acquired knowledge. The specialised vocabulary is activated. The formats of media presentation and technical characteristics are specifically developed.

In two courses, the module deals with China's ongoing process of societal modernisation and the diverse associated challenges. On the one hand, it offers a broader historical overview of content-related sub-areas of the social challenges such as minority problems or protest and democracy movements. On the other hand, students are given the opportunity to deepen some aspects in seminar form. Thematically, these seminars deal, for example, with the special situation of women in China or with the phenomenon of suicide. The module is aimed at students in an advanced stage of their studies.
Students acquire the ability to understand social change processes in their historical and political contexts. They become acquainted with different academic perspectives on the phenomenon of social change and are able to reflect them critically.

As part of the semester abroad at Peking University, the ECLC offers two content courses at an appropriate level in Chinese, which deal with discourses on cultural and social topics. For example, phenomena of everyday culture are dealt with in their development and current practice as well as in their evaluation in current social discourse. The course takes place exclusively in the compulsory semester abroad (fourth language semester).
Intended learning outcomes
Students are familiar with contemporary phenomena, especially in the Chinese culture of everyday life, and are able to critically identify them in Chinese discourse. They are able to communicate appropriately about them in Chinese.

The module consists of two courses that deal with alternating current topics. China's pace of development has been at a very high level for more than three decades, so that it is necessary to deal with current topics beyond the long-term fixed study specialisation. Therefore, this module offers the opportunity to take up new trends in China's society, politics or economy and to deal with them exemplarily in the form of two courses. The module is primarily aimed at students in the later stages of their studies.
The module provides students with the competence to deal with a current topic academically and to work on it with the help of appropriate sources. This ability is the basic requirement for successfully writing a Bachelor's thesis.

The module consists of two courses within one year. Firstly, it offers an overview of the religions that have culturally shaped China and its East Asian neighbours Korea and Japan. Secondly, it deals with the interactions between politics and religion. The focus is on new religious phenomena such as Falungong, as well as on the People's Republic of China's religious policy. Using the examples of religions, the different political and social developments in the East Asian region are presented. Thus, the module also anchors China in the greater East Asian region. The module is aimed at students in an advanced stage of their studies.
Students acquire the ability to determine and classify religious phenomena in their historical and social contexts. They are able to critically analyse religious as well as policy issues and decisions in the People's Republic of China.

The module introduces the social and cultural history of the imperial period, in particular the Song, Ming and Qing dynasties, by means of selected institutions, phenomena, structures and problem areas. It shows longer-term developments, continuities and ruptures as well as it includes the global contexts in a comparative way. It combines an introductory lecture with a seminar, in which the topics of the lecture are further deepened and exemplified.
The participants of this module are able to describe and classify some fundamental institutions and contexts of pre-modern Chinese society and culture. They are able to research and analyse relevant research questions and communicate findings appropriately. They acquire necessary terminological and instrumental technical tools.

The module deals with two different epochs and/or schools of intellectual history of pre-modern or modern China in two consecutive semesters. The students get acquainted with the positions, arguments, terminology, and reference systems of the respective schools of intellectual history and epochs using original texts in translation. This provides an introduction to exemplary areas of Chinese intellectual history. Since the terminology is also dealt with in Chinese, the module is suitable for students from the third semester onwards.
Students are able to differentiate positions and arguments as well as terminologies in the covered epochs and schools and to independently classify them in argumentative contexts. They have basic skills of developing further epochs of intellectual history critically.

From the third semester onwards, the module offers students access to the language and history of Japan. The focus is on Japan's interaction with China and other neighbouring countries in East Asia. In the Japanese crash course, students are first provided with the basics of the Japanese language, which can be expanded upon, by drawing on previously acquired knowledge of the Chinese language. In addition to basic grammar structures and vocabulary, this includes the active and passive use of the writing systems. In particular, technical training is given in the communication and research-oriented pronunciation of Sino-Japanese terms with reference to China. Apart from a compact chronological overview regarding the history of Japan, the module offers an introduction to cultural, economic and political contacts with mainland Asia and the West since the 19th century.
Students are able to independently classify events in Japanese history chronologically and thematically. They have the basic knowledge of independent and in-depth familiarisation with further questions of historical and current contacts between China and Japan.

The module consists of the courses "Intercultural Competence China" and "Digital Resources", which are taken in the third and sixth semester. The courses address specific needs of the students at the respective time of study. The block seminar "Intercultural Competence China" consists of a theory-oriented and a practice-oriented part. The first part provides the students with the theoretical basics of intercultural communication, its application to China as well as China's cultural and regional studies. In the second part, case studies are used to work out and analyse communication problems in different areas of German-Chinese cooperation. The exercise "Digital Resources" imparts basic knowledge of Chinese EDP for the preparation of academic papers and for the use of digital resources. It also introduces the use of digital resources during the collection of primary data and the creation of statistics and databases for integration into academic papers, especially the Bachelor's thesis.
Students are able to recognise and interpret intercultural characteristics and differences between China and Germany. They find solutions for characteristic intercultural problems. They are able to use digital resources independently and process collected data material. They are able to carry out bibliographic research and use it for seminar papers and the Bachelor thesis.

Students spend three months working on a longer academic paper (at least 30 pages) on a self-chosen topic. They research, collect data and work on relevant research literature. Finally, they present the topic in a written paper, with a suitable structure, in a linguistically and stylistically appealing presentation as well as with complete referencing and documentation.
Intended learning outcomes
Students have deepened and consolidated skills for independent academic research, formulating a research question, analytically fathom out an academic problem area and presenting gained insights in a professional form and language.
