The course has the character of a workshop that accompanies and assists students in the process of projecting and writing their master's theses. It starts out from and returns to the participants' ongoing research projects. On this basis, the course deals not only with general questions concerning academic writing and research techniques but also with concrete concerns raised by individual topics. Offering specimens of their own work, the participants are expected to engage in discussion about their individual research questions and methods. The course can be attended by students who are currently in the process of writing a thesis in the field of English Literature and British Cultural Studies.
Intended learning outcomes
By successfully participating in the module students learn how to conceptualize a specific field of research in literary and cultural studies and how to place and frame their own research in that field. This comprises the following concrete competencies: time management; research techniques; structuring academic writing on macro and micro levels; formulating operable research questions; fruitfully positioning oneself in relation to complex debates in literary or cultural studies; using and critically pondering scholarly concepts, methods and theories in autonomous research projects; presenting one's own research adequately in terms of methodology, conceptualization and theorization.

Literature and cultural practices I – The early modern period and the Enlightenment: This module will draw on central current research questions and approaches in order to teach authors, genres and concepts relevant to the time from the beginning of the early modern period to beginning of the Enlightenment (i.e. from the early 16th to the middle of the 18th centuries). The focus is on: (1) specific developments in the literary system, in aesthetics and in the history of ideas as they were evolving through the reception or transformation of models from classical antiquity or continental Europe (classicism, humanism, Petrarchism, the Enlightenment, the discourse of sensibility); (2) historical practices of text production and reception (such as print culture and the emergence of the public sphere, patronage and the literary market, theatre and production practices, the novel and the reading public); and (3) the political and social contexts of cultural production (e.g. discourses of the nation, the Reformation and confessional conflicts, colonisation and trade, gender hierarchies).
By successfully participating in the module students gain a deepened understanding not only of the most important genres and the defining aesthetic developments in the literature of the early modern period, the Restoration and the Enlightenment but also of the fundamental social and political developments of the epoch. This will provide them with the competency of situating authors and texts from the early 16th to the mid-18th centuries in literary, intellectual, media and cultural history. Participants will also learn how to gauge the interdependencies between text, form, medium and cultural situation – and thus the specific cultural work of literary texts – in a clearly differentiated manner and in view of the current research discussion.

Literature and cultural practices II – Romanticism and 19th century: This module deals with literature and cultural practices from the middle of the 18th up to the end of the 19th centuries (Romanticism, Victorian period, fin de siècle). Drawing on literary and non-literary texts as well as on visual media (print, painting, photography) the courses offered within this module trace and critically reflect on the lines of development between premodern and modern times. The module allows for concretely engaging with specialized topics in this field, such as the social functions of literature and literary criticism (e.g. the condition of England novel or the cultural construction of the critic as 'sage'); conceptions of authorship and literary production (e.g. the Romantic notion of the 'poet genius' and the postulate of 'originality', the problem of female authorship, the cult of the author and the professionalization of writing, new forms of publishing); nature and industrialization (e.g. nature poetry as an early form of ecocriticism, the industrial novel and reform movements); constructions of history and the modern experience of the present (e.g. the rise of the historical novel; artworks and texts of the Pre-Raphaelite Brotherhood); the transformation of gender hierarchies (e.g. the evolution of separate spheres; sexual morality and hypocrisy; deviant conceptions of femininity and masculinity); constructions of nationhood and the British Empire (e.g. the constructions and appropriations of 'Otherness' in literature and the arts, adventure novels as an instrument of empire building, literature as a vehicle of cultural domination, but also the representation of rural spaces in regional novels and regional poetry).
By successfully participating in the module students gain a deepened understanding not only of the most important genres and aesthetic developments in the literatures of Romanticism, the Victorian period, and the fin de siècle but also of the formative social and political transformations of the epoch. On this basis they will be able to precisely situate authors and texts from the late 18th to the end of the 19th centuries in their literary, intellectual, medial and cultural contexts. Participants will also learn how to gauge the interdependencies between text, form, medium and cultural situation – and thus the specific cultural work of literary texts – in a clearly differentiated manner and in view of the current research discussion.
