Course of Studies - Contents and Objectives

Latin Philology as a Bachelor main subject provides fundamental knowledge of the language, expands this systematically and works towards a comprehensive analytic/hermeneutic competence in handling literary texts of Classical Antiquity, going to examine later significant stages of their reception in Antiquity, the Middle Ages and the Modern Period. In the process, students become familiar with specialist electronic auxiliary material (TLG, Perseus/Tufts, other data bases for classical studies) and with perspectives in interdisciplinary research. The training in forms of research and presentation during studies (portfolio, written thesis with presentation, semester paper) is applicable in every career area connected in the most general way with the acquisition, processing and communication of information; in particular, of course, (besides university work) the traditional career opportunities include publishing, adult education, culture management etc. A departmental speciality, reflected in the programme of studies, is the continued lively influence of Latin literature in the Early Modern Period (New Latin). The training includes examination of the material prerequisites for text transmission as well as work on and editing of ancient textual evidence using modern methods and auxiliary materials.

The competence acquired by students in evaluating and contextualizing the chronologically distant knowledge transmitted in the literatures of Greece is equally applicable to other unfamiliar intellectual materials which lie beyond the horizon of their daily experience. A special focus, already mentioned above, is on text transmission, in this case particularly on philosophical writings on papyrus. Experience with texts of the various philosophical schools of Greek antiquity contribute to competence in evaluating and categorizing current ethical questions in the light of classical thought. By referring to reception phenomena of various epochs, these structures also become transparent in a diachronic perspective, thus training the capacity for (inter-)cultural transfer. With its key chronological position, the subject represents an ideal basis for a deeper understanding not only of the literature of Europe, but also of its cultures and especially its cross-border phenomena (oriental roots of Greek thought, the expansion of Greek culture in Hellenism, the function of Greek culture within the Roman Empire etc.). This kind of deeper understanding of European culture is also a prerequisite for any intercultural discourse going beyond the European horizon.

Taking as their model the treatment of Classical Antiquity as our 'nearest foreignness' (U. Hölscher), students learn on the one hand to contextualize and evaluate historically phenomena lying beyond the horizons of their everyday experience and on the other hand to make use of the distance which alone gives an overview to help them find their own standpoints. Study of the texts of the various ancient schools of philosophy, in which many a fundamental question of continuing relevance today was raised, facilitates making a personal response to current ethical, social and theological challenges. By considering the continuation of classical influence in later epochs, patterns of thought can also become transparent in a diachronic perspective and thus develop the capacity for (inter-)cultural transfer. As the language of European culture, Latin provides an ideal starting point for deepening one's understanding of the Anglo-Saxon, Romance and German literatures and cultures.
